Take me to the hospital and put me in a bed. But do not take me where the bricks are all of one red. For that's a sign of danger, and I do not like the shoen. In fact, I'd rather see the bricks a nice bright, sandy green.

Now, I prefer to see the place arrayed in robes of white. 'Twould make a nice clean breast of things and do the job up right. Folds could not rest contented on the inside looking out. With color scheme regulated on the buildings round about.

That sort of stuff sounds very nice, but gentlemen, you know, an hospital was never meant to be a place for show. To room star for fancy bricks is nonsense in my mind. The red can be at home, and cheaper, too, you'll find.

Take me to the hospital and put me in a bed. I care not whether bricks are blue, or green, or red; Just want to be in the blankets, and see the sheets are clean. If on the inside things are right, then all will be serene.

Bert. P. Day, son of Mrs. Day, 186 Hughson street north, who went to England with the first lot of A. M. C. men of this city, and is now with the Duke of Connaught's Hospital at Cliveden, Taplow, recently won the boxing championship, bantam weight class, of the English army. Writing to his mother, under date of April 12, he says:

Well, mother, I have won the bantam weight championship boxing match in the army, and I think a lot of it, too. I will tell you all about it right. I had to fight a lot of men, and I won them all. I was boxing with a friend of mine and the officer in charge of the sports saw me and said "you were a box." I said "I don't think I could kick a two cent snail but he replied, go ahead and let me see how you can fight." I did not think I could kick a two cent snail but he replied, go ahead and let me see how you can fight.
